ANTHROPOLOGY

uci anthropologists ask questions like:

✓ How does poverty literally make people sick?

✓ How does the Internet shape how we understand everything from space to the self?

✓ How has traditional Chinese medicine turned into a multibillion-dollar global industry?

✓ How do society and culture impact drug addiction?

their cutting-edge research on social issues takes place around the world

UCI anthropologists link emergent ways of thinking and living to histories of colonialism, economic interchange and mediated communication.

Innovative research has taken UCI anthropologists everywhere from markets in Egypt, design studios in Sweden, the borderlands of the U.S.–Mexico, and the transnational network of Hyderabadis, to virtual worlds in cyberspace to better understand global cultures and societal norms.

UCI anthropologists have discovered a link between poverty and diabetes, answers to how and why identities that at first appear "Western" take on new forms around the world, and new ways in which communications technology remakes money. The department ranks at the top of the field nationally, and fourth in the world in publishing findings in the top three anthropological journals.

More than 200 undergrads and 45 grads annually major in anthropology where they study alongside the department's faculty experts in areas of gender issues; virtual worlds; immigration; science, medicine and technology; markets and finance; ethnomusicology; and transnationalism.
