

Professor Judith Treas's research finds why U.S. couples may be at odds over housework; graduate student Leah Ruppner, who studies family dynamics, demonstrates this conflict with husband Casey Wagner. Photo by Daniel Anderson, UCI Communications.

- Nearly 800 undergrads pursue majors in sociology each year and an additional 12,000 enroll in sociology courses
- More than 80 graduate students study alongside the department's 28 distinguished faculty
- Topics studied include:
 - Democracy
 - Families
 - Globalization
 - Immigration
 - Inequality
 - Labor unions
 - Population
 - Social movements
 - Social networks

949.824.6800 | bfitzjar@uci.edu
www.sociology.uci.edu

What will an increasingly older population mean for our economy and way of life? What roles do racial preferences play in dating? How many undocumented immigrants live in the United States and what does this mean for policymakers? UCI sociologists look beyond conventional explanations to investigate how conflict, cooperation and diversity impact our world.

investigate

Innovative research explores how employment and incarceration status can change racial perceptions, how career prioritization decisions impact husbands and wives differently, and how social movements can impact democracies.

innovate

UCI sociological research findings impact international population policy, design and implementation of the U.S. Census, and development of more effective communication plans for times of crisis.

impact